

Patient information from BMJ

Last published: Aug 05, 2021

Living with Crohn disease

Crohn disease can be a frustrating illness. Some of the time you might feel fine, and other times you might feel as though you can't do much at all.

Over time you'll probably get better at listening to your body and working out what you can and can't do on a particular day.

We've talked to doctors and to people who have Crohn. Here, we look at some of the ideas they had about living with the condition.

- It's worth taking some time to find out about Crohn disease. Research suggests that people who got more information tended to feel less anxious. Knowing more about Crohn can help you recognize the times when you need to see a doctor.

Being aware of the different medications that might help is also useful. For example, you can ask your doctor about switching medicines if you're getting side effects from your treatment.

- Talking to your doctor is a good first step for learning more about Crohn. The internet is another useful source of information, although it's worth looking at who wrote the information on a particular website, to make sure it's reliable.

Other people with Crohn can help by offering information and support. You might want to find a support group in your area, or look for forums or chat rooms online.

- Some people with Crohn find that the food they eat doesn't affect their symptoms much. For others, particular foods can cause problems. For example, if you have a narrow section in your bowel, foods that have lots of fiber may lead to a blockage, while some people with Crohn need more fiber.

You can ask your doctor to refer you to a dietitian. A dietitian can help you adjust your diet while still getting all the nutrients you need to stay healthy.

- If you smoke, this can be especially harmful if you have Crohn disease, as it can mean that you get symptoms more often. Also, surgery for Crohn is less successful in people who smoke. If you want to quit smoking, there are treatments that can help. Talk to your doctor or pharmacist.

Living with Crohn disease

- It's important to pay attention to how you're feeling. Crohn disease doesn't happen because of stress, but people who are especially depressed or anxious seem to get worse symptoms. And if you're feeling stressed, this may make it harder to cope with your illness.

Your doctor can provide advice and recommend treatments if you're feeling stressed, anxious, or depressed.

- Talk to your doctor about day-to-day medicines for treating symptoms like stomach pain or cramps. For example, antispasmodic drugs can help with cramps. If you get pain, many doctors recommend acetaminophen.

You can get stronger pain relievers on prescription. But you should avoid pain relievers called nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDs) - ibuprofen is one of the most common. These drugs can irritate your stomach, which might make the symptoms of Crohn worse.

The patient information from BMJ Best Practice is regularly updated. The most recent version of Best Practice can be found at bestpractice.bmj.com. This information is intended for use by health professionals. It is not a substitute for medical advice. It is strongly recommended that you independently verify any interpretation of this material and, if you have a medical problem, see your doctor.

Please see BMJ's full terms of use at: bmj.com/company/legal-information. BMJ does not make any representations, conditions, warranties or guarantees, whether express or implied, that this material is accurate, complete, up-to-date or fit for any particular purposes.

© BMJ Publishing Group Ltd 2024. All rights reserved.

What did you think about this patient information guide?

Complete the online survey or scan the QR code to help us to ensure our content is of the highest quality and relevant for patients. The survey is anonymous and will take around 5 minutes to complete.

BMJ Group